Recapturing Our Soul

Congregations, agencies and state relations

LAUNCH INVITATION

THEOLOGY & MINISTRY

INTRODUCTION

Many institutions within the community service sector have a religious background and motivation. This service grows out of belief. However, with the professionalisation of health provision in an increasingly plural society, some gap has developed between believing communities and the associated agencies. Recapturing Our Soul examines this gap and considers various ways of uniting communities, church

Recapturing our Soul will examine the complex theological positions, social issues and regulatory requirements governing the relationship between faith communities, their agencies and the Australian state today congregations, community service delivery and the state sector. It will stimulate a clearer understanding of the added value of the church's core values to community service provision and explore the future connections between the church and agency/ third sector community work.

In partnership with the Diaconal Research Institute of Heidelberg University, Recapturing Our Soul addresses the particular Australian context by facilitating a dialogue between German and Australian voices. The evident differences of church context and governmental relationships set the similar issues of relationship into clear relief.

This conference brings together theorists, high-level agency and church administrators, along with practitioners from both the religious and the service provision contexts.

The Recapturing Our Soul conference will map the key issues, and present constructive proposals for the complex variety of challenges and opportunities facing the church, its agencies and the state today.

We hope you will join us in this important conversation and look forward to welcoming you to diverse metropolitan Melbourne in September, 2016.

Congregations, agencies and state relations

INTRODUCTION | Three parallel streams will examine:

1. Theologies of agencies:

This stream examines the range of theological supports for agency work as a clear outworking of Christian faith and witness. It concentrates on existing theological themes, the integration of insights from service provision into complex agendas about theology and the nature of the church and the creation of bridges between agency administrators and theologians.

2. Economics of funding:

Funding is not neutral. It directs the economies or forms of service provision, and this in ways that might conflict with congregational agendas. This stream considers the benefits and constraints of popular funding models and the potential of alternative models (e.g. social impact bonds), especially as these inform the relationship between agencies and churches.

3. Advocacy:

To what extent can agencies that receive public funding also advocate for policy change, and what different forms might such advocacy take? This stream examines the range of available options, the different levels of advocacy, the potential limits funding imposes, and the freedoms agencies, churches and theological voices have due to the formal incorporation of agencies as service providers.
